A little bit of history...

Academic Tradition: The beginnings of academic tradition in the United States date from the second Tuesday in the month of August 1642, when the first American commencement was held at Harvard University. Yale University bestowed the first doctor of philosophy degree in 1861. These first commencements, as a reminder of how much tradition has changed, featured degree candidates who demonstrated their learning with debates and orations, usually in Latin or Greek.

Costume History: Medieval and early renaissance universities of Europe are the source of academic costume. The caps and gowns now worn for commencement are variations of the elaborate billowing robes and intricate hats originally used to combat the chill in the drafty and unheated halls of 12th and 13th century institutions. Throughout the ages, the design of academic costume evolved not with fashion but with architecture; the individuality of each institution was represented by color, fabric, and accessories. Furs, lace, gold trim appliqués, and hoods indicated not only college, but also what rank and degree had been attained.

This is not an official college document.

Every effort has been made to ensure that all graduating students that applied by the application deadline are listed in the Commencement program. Graduation candidates that applied during the late application period may not be listed in the Commencement program.
